A slapstick musical comedy, Buggy Malone follows the rivalry between two half-witted street gangs. In this film noir spoof, the message is one of good, clean fun; the characters are wonderful exaggerated cartoons; and the weapons of choice are "splurge" whip cream guns, flour bombs, and custard pies.

Section 3 The Wall street crash and the Great Depression

During the 1920s many people invested their money in stocks (shares of ownership in companies). For a few years the value of stocks rose rapidly. In September 1929, however, stock prices began to fall. In October they "crashed." This meant that people's stocks were now worth almost nothing.

Many people lost all the money they had. Banks were hurt as well. People who had borrowed money from banks were unable to pay it back. Many banks failed because crowds of people tried to take out all their money at once. When a bank failed, people with accounts there lost their savings. In addition, factories and businesses closed because not enough people were able to buy the goods they produced or sold. By 1932 about 12 to 13 million people were out of work. People with jobs were paid only about half of what they had earned before.
